

The climate footprint of most livestock-dependent communities in the developing world is far smaller than that of their counterparts elsewhere.

They have contributed very little to climate change yet they, and their animals, are suffering its harshest impacts.